Excerpt: ... CHAPTER XXIV. CONCLUSION. TN our last Chapter we have considered the nature of the evidence afforded by unorganized mineral bodies, in proof of the existence of design in the original adaptation of the material elements to their various functions, in the inorganic and organic departments of the natural world, and have seen that the only sufficient explanation we can discover, of the orderly and wonderful dispositions of the material elements in measure and number and weight, throughout the terraqueous globe, is that which refers the origin of everything above us, and beneath us, and around us, to the will and workings of One Omnipotent Creator. If the properties imparted to these elements at the moment of their creation, adapted them beforehand to the infinity of complicated useful purposes which they have already answered, and may have further still to answer, under many successive dispensations in the material world, such an aboriginal constitution, so far from superseding an intelligent Agent, would only exalt our conceptions of the consummate skill and power that could comprehend such an infinity of future uses under future systems, in the original groundwork of His Creation. In an early part of our inquiry, we traced back the history of the Primary rocks, which composed the first solid materials of the globe, to a probable condition of universal fusion, incompatible with the existence of any forms of organic life, and saw reason to conclude that as the crust of the globe became gradually reduced in temperature, the unstratified crystalline rocks, and stratified rocks produced by their destruction, were disposed and modified, during long periods of time, by physical forces, the same in kind with those which actually subsist, but more intense in the...
